

Privacy Policy and Code of Ethics

Trust is the foundation of our work. This document explains how I handle your information and the ethical principles I follow in my practice.

1. Principle of Confidentiality

Everything you share during sessions remains strictly between us. I do not disclose your name, the content of our conversations, or the fact that you have sought my services.

Exceptions to Confidentiality (pursuant to legislation and professional ethics):

- A clear risk of harm to yourself (suicidal intent) or to others.
- Reports of the commission of a serious crime.
- Receipt of an official request from law enforcement agencies in accordance with the current legislation of Ukraine.
- Professional Supervision: Discussing complex cases with expert colleagues. In this instance, all data is strictly anonymized—your name and any identifying details are never revealed.

1.1. Confidentiality in Specific Cases

Features of Family Therapy:

- When working with a couple, confidentiality extends to both partners. The psychologist shall not disclose information received from one partner to third parties.
- The initiating partner (who scheduled the first session) is responsible for ensuring the other partner is aware of this Policy before joint work begins.
- The psychologist adheres to a "No Secrets" principle within the couple: information shared by one partner in an individual conversation may be brought to a joint discussion if it is necessary to achieve therapeutic goals.

Confidentiality in Working with Minors:

- Parents or legal guardians are responsible for explaining the essence of this Privacy Policy to the child in an accessible way, considering their age and development.
- The content of conversations with a minor is confidential. Parents have the right to receive general updates on counseling progress, but specific details of conversations are disclosed to them only with the child's consent or in cases where there is a threat to the child's life or health.

2. Data Collection and Storage

- I only collect data necessary for communication (name, phone number, e-mail).
- Your contact details are never transferred to third parties for marketing or advertising purposes.
- Any notes I may take during a session for professional purposes are stored in a secure location without including your last name.

3. Professional Boundaries

- I do not enter into friendly, romantic, or business relationships with Clients outside of therapy.
- If we happen to meet in a public place, I will not greet you first. This is to avoid putting you in an awkward position and to keep the fact of our professional relationship private.

4. The "Do No Harm" Principle

I practice only within the scope of my competence. If I feel that your request requires the assistance of another specialist (e.g., a psychiatrist, endocrinologist, or lawyer), I will inform you and provide the appropriate recommendations.
